Since the bride's parents usually pay for everything, invites said that they demanded the honor of your presence in the marriage of their daughter. These days, with divorce, mixed families, unconventional families, and any of the above helping to pay for it, the wedding invitation formulation is Complex! The wedding invitation sets the tone and indicates the level of formality of the event. If you're hosting a classic wedding, the formulation of wedding invitations should follow these traditional guidelines. What is hosting?: The names your guests will see in your wedding invitation are the ones who pay for the event. Request: The next line in the wedding invitation is the one that requires your guests to visit. Happy couple: Etiquette says that the bride should be listed first using the first and second words only. Then the groom should be listed using both the name and the middle name. Date and Time: Traditionally, the date and time are set out. Location: If the ceremony is a well-known location, you don't have to include an address. But in smaller places or in your home, you want to write an address. Time for reception: Inform guests that there will be a party afterwards. It can be included in a wedding invitation or on a separate reply card. If you don't serve a full meal, it's nice to let guests know. A separate reception card is often good to use if the ceremony and reception are in different places, or the reception does not immediately follow the ceremony. Get them on RSVP: Traditionally, RSVP was written on the invitation, and guests knew to answer their stationery. Now, most couples find that they receive answers more immediately if they include a separate response card. It can be mostly empty, allowing guests to write a note, or it can be more detailed. Additional details: Optional details include telling your guests what to wear. The most stringin etiquette tells you not to get into the details of the attire of your invitation, but it is considered an outdated opinion. Guests appreciate the clues on how to dress and aren't as instinctively knowledgeable as they used to be. Some couples who don't want children at the reception can write an Adult Admission that is more polite than writing No Children.
